Prolonged hypothermia enhances the degree of apoptotic neuronal loss after cardiopulmonary resuscitation. Prolonged hypothermia impairs the recovery of neurologic function after cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR), and is known to cause cell death. However, the mechanism of the degeneration of neuronal cells during CPR remains unknown. To examine whether prolonged hypothermia during CPR enhances the degree of neuronal cell death, we continuously examined neuronal cell death after inducing hypothermia for 20 minutes in 30 degrees C saline-perfused rats, and we also continuously measured rectal temperature. The results of neuronal cell death in the hippocampal CA1 (Hp-CA1) region were determined by the terminal deoxynucleotidyl transferase-mediated biotin-deoxyuridine triphosphate nick end-labeling (TUNEL) method. The rectal temperature at 20 and 40 minutes after CPR was significantly lower than that at baseline. The number of TUNEL-positive cells in Hp-CA1 was significantly greater than that in sham-operated animals. The number of TUNEL-positive cells was significantly greater in CPR-rats at 20 minutes after CPR when the rectal temperature was or=15 degrees C significantly increased the number of TUNEL-positive cells. These findings indicate that prolonged hypothermia after CPR could enhance the degree of cell death in Hp-CA1, and that this process is closely associated with the degree of hypothermia.Q: How to delete redundant data from multiple columns I have a spreadsheet that I'm pulling data from but for some reason the data is occasionally added twice.
