The Player Impact Engine uses the data gathered to create "Player Intelligence" that can help football players decide how to play a pass, tackle, or defend, based on how the player is aligned on the pitch. The engine analyzes the position of the player, what kind of athlete he is, what position he plays, and how the movement of his teammates impacts his decisions, and uses this information to determine the intelligence of a player's actions. The engine also analyzes the player's ball-in-play actions to determine if the player is taking the most impactful actions. To do this, the engine analyses the ball position and the relative positioning of the player in space and compares that to how the player's teammate is positioned relative to the player. This enables the engine to not only predict the next pass the player will deliver, but also how the ball will fall to the player, and where the teammate will be to receive the pass. This also allows the engine to set up a defensive strategy that will make the most out of the player's ball-in-play movements, for example short passes in tight spaces when the player is outnumbered. When a player is close to receiving a pass, the engine analyses the positions of the player, their teammate, and the ball to see if the pass can be completed. If it can, the ball will react to the player's passing movement by either flying to the closest teammate, or deflecting depending on where the best opportunity for a shot lies. Once the engine has made its decision, the engine will set up the nearby teammate's positioning to take advantage of the pass. All this is then taken into account when evaluating a player's on-ball actions. For example, a player can run towards a pass with his back to his teammate to purposely outnumber his opponent and take the ball, and the engine will understand that and help the player deliver a perfect pass with positioning to take advantage of the situation. As players move around the pitch, they can execute passing, dribbling, or through-ball skills and be rewarded by the engine for doing so. The engine will evaluate each action based on the type of pass or skill executed, and the coaching points that the player is awarded will be saved with the player's Career Statistics, giving the player the ability to improve his game by identifying areas to improve on the pitch. The engine also evaluates a player's

In vivo efficacy of SFRP1 as a diagnostic marker for ovarian cancer: the role of miRNA in ovarian cancer. Ovarian cancer is the second most common gynecologic cancer, which is known to be invasive and lethal. However, its early detection in primary stages is difficult. Consequently, there is an urgent need for new screening diagnostic methods. Shortening of the filia terpinus (SFRP1) has been shown to cause ovarian tumorigenesis, so we performed this study to investigate the diagnostic role of SFRP1 as a biomarker for ovarian cancer. This study investigated the differential expression of SFRP1 in ovarian cancer cell lines, ovarian cancer tissues and serum samples by immunohistochemistry and RT-PCR. Furthermore, we performed RT-PCR to analyze the expression of miR-200a, miR-34a and miR-200c in human ovarian cancer tissues and cell lines. The differential expression of SFRP1 in ovarian cancer tissues, cell lines and serum samples was detected by immunohistochemistry and RT-PCR, respectively. Immunohistochemistry results revealed that SFRP1 was expressed in 91.3% of the ovarian cancer tissues while expressed only in 2.3% of the normal ovarian tissues. In addition, SFRP1 was decreased in the cell lines (P 0.05). SFRP1 was down-regulated in the ovarian cancer tissues, cell lines and serum samples of patients with ovarian cancer. The expression of miR-200a, miR-34a and miR-
